History and Significance

Tikal was founded around 200 BC and quickly rose to become one of the most powerful Mayan city-states. It reached its peak during the Classic period (250-900 AD), when it ruled over a vast territory and controlled a network of trade routes.

Tikal was a center of learning and culture, and its rulers were renowned for their patronage of the arts and sciences. The city was also a major religious center, and its temples were used for performing rituals and ceremonies.

In the 9th century AD, Tikal was abandoned for reasons that are still not fully understood. The city was eventually reclaimed by the jungle, and it remained hidden for centuries until it was rediscovered by European explorers in the 19th century.
