The book is a collection of personal essays by author Maureen Mullarkey, who grew up in a large Irish Catholic family in the 1950s and 1960s. Mullarkey writes with humor and candor about her experiences growing up in a time when the Catholic Church held sway over almost every aspect of life. She recalls the strict rules and regulations that governed her childhood, from the way she dressed to the way she spoke. But she also remembers the warmth and love that permeated her family life, and the sense of community that she felt within her parish.

Mullarkey's essays are not just a look back at a bygone era, but also a meditation on the changes that have taken place in society over the past few decades. She writes about the decline of the Catholic Church's influence, the rise of secularism, and the increasing acceptance of diversity. She does not mourn these changes, but she does recognize that they have resulted in a loss of some of the values that were once so important to her.
